At the center of every solution? People.
No individual, organization or place can build the future alone. But too often, our efforts to collaborate fall short. We don’t effectively align and mobilize the people and assets we need to take on ambitious challenges.

With Strategic Doing, you can build honest, focused and caring collaborations among diverse participants, and get more done...right away. This day-long (10 am - 4 pm) workshop will introduce you to a new set of practices you can implement in any group you work with. You’ll also hear from MSU faculty Bob Brown, who’s been using Strategic Doing in Flint for several years - he’ll discuss both the challenges of working in Flint and the difference Strategic Doing has made.

For more information on Strategic Doing, visit strategicdoing.net. For more on the day, contact Eric Walcott at walcott3@anr.msu.edu.

Strategic Doing is hands down the most effective framework I have crossed paths with when it comes to turning conversations into action. Needless to say, I am a fully converted believer.

Titus Tomlinson
Community Service Center
University of Oregon